

A modern machine learning technique is used to reconstruct the energy deposition pattern of the primary particle interacting with the detector. The energy deposition pattern on the primary track is one of the fundamental quantities to achieve sufficient rejection power for particle identification analysis. We developed a recurrent neural network to predict the correct energy depositions of the primary particle. The neural network does a good job of reproducing Monte Carlo information from digitized data.